Benefit will be received from the logical habit of thought thus engendered, not less than from the knowledge acquired. The first of the two parts into which the work has been divided contains its subject-matter proper. The definitions and views given are not designed to be an exposition of current and accepted usage or literature. Rather they constitute a sporadic attempt at clear, consecutive setting forth of individual thought. The book is constructive in spirit, not critical; and it is purposely almost devoid of historical and personal allusions. Part second consists of summaries of the chief theories of the nature of matter, energy, and force. These are intended mainly to give more concreteness to the concepts than could properly be introduced into the first part...
